

Herbert von Karajan - The Early Lucerne Years

aud 21.464

EAN: 4022143214645

Gramophone (01.12.2023)

GRAMOPHONE

Box-Set Round-up

Rob Cowan revisits great recordings of the past from four conductors and a pianist

[...] Maazel was in general a less consistent recording artist than Herbert von Karajan and yet, having said that, I've always been in two minds about some of Karajan's commercial orchestral recordings. Too often they glare under a [...] sheen (or seem to), so when you're lucky enough to catch one of the best taped Karajan broadcasts, which ditch the impression of excessive control-room production, the effect can be revelatory. Such is recent audite collection, "Herbert von Karajan: The Early Lucerne Years, 1952-1957", which includes among its contents quite a few gems. Most unexpected is Brahms's Violin Concerto with Nathan Milstein, recorded in 1957, Karajan and his Swiss Festival Orchestra fully ablaze, Milstein an athlete of the [...], his tone typically lean and sinewy, the whole experience so different to the sumptuous Brahms that Christian Ferras, Karajan and the Berlin Phil provided for DG. Mozart's C minor Piano Concerto, K 491, finds Karajan and his Swiss players supportive of Robert Casadesu in 1952, a [...] finely sculpted reading where two strong personalities blend as one, Clara Haskil and Géza Anda commune sympathetically across Bach's C major Concerto for two pianos, BWV 1061, in 1955, and there are two Beethoven symphonies: No 6 (Philharmonia Orchestra, 1956), which is similar in outline to Karajan's 1962 BPO recording except that the first movement repeat is played, which it isn't in Berlin, and No 8 (Swiss Festival Orchestra, 1952), a lusty [...], though the finale is no match for its dynamic 1962 Berlin successor. Honegger's "Symphonie liturgique" from 1955 swirls into action on the eye of a storm, though I wouldn't want to deny myself the extra breadth of the "De profundis clamavi" second movement on Karajan's wonderful Berlin recording (14'26" as opposed to 13'07" in Lucerne). But turn to Brahms's Fourth with the Philharmonia (1956) and it's a whole different ball game, with added weight and muscle-power in Lucerne (note the timps in the Scherzo), especially in the finale at the point where the chorale theme returns at 5'41". It's an intriguing hatch of musically worthwhile live Karajan discoveries, very well transferred from clean analogue sources. Here's hoping for more of the same. [...]

BOX-SET Round-up

Rob Cowan revisits great recordings of the past from four conductors and a pianist

Having already released its complete Otto Klemperer recordings involving orchestras alone (excepting his Beethoven Ninth and some Mahler with voices – 1973), Warner Classics has followed up with a second volume centring on opera and sacred works. There's also a typically rigorous Jon Tolansky documentary, Otto Klemperer: An Opera Staccato, involving commentaries from Nicolaï Gikharov, John Dolson, Siva Ole and the like, as well as copious musical extracts. The opera inclusions are headed by what must surely be one of the most vibrantly beautiful recordings of Mozart's Die Zauberflöte ever made, a Savi Raj Gudi production taped at London's Kingsway Hall in 1964 with a cast including Gedda, Gundula Janowitz, Walter Berry, Lucia Popp, Gottlob Frick, Elisabeth Schwarzkopf and Christa Ludwig. To hear the glorious Janowitz sing Pamina's aria 'Ach, ich fühl's' in such serene orchestral surroundings is a lifelike experience. The remaining Mozart operas include a Don Giovanni from 1966 with Nicolaï Gikharov and Christa Ludwig, Tim Ashley and Neil Fisher revisited this recording for 'Classics Reconsidered' (4/21), NF rounding up with the words 'It's hard to think of any conductor today who could impress his own vision across an opera with as much conviction as Klemperer does. He casts a long shadow, and the recording should absolutely be considered a classic for that achievement.' The other Mozart operas (Così fan tutti and Le nozze di Figaro) were recorded somewhat later, and although well cast, tend towards slow tempos.

A 1968 Wagner Flying Dutchman, although memorable, is less fiery than a live Royal Festival Hall performance given at around the same time and released on CD by Testament (10/08). Ditts Beethoven's Fidelio, where Klemperer preferred his Covent Garden cast to the one settled on for this generally marvellous (and far better-engineered) Walter Legge stereo production, Jon Vickers's Florestan being a highlight. Don't be in two minds, I'd say I was especially taken with a 1969 account of Die Walküre's Act 1 and Wotan's Farewell with Helga Dernesch (Sieglinde), William Cocherin (Siegmund) and Hans Sotin (Hunding).

As to the sacred items, it's worth noting that the Christian convert Klemperer remained a practising Roman Catholic until 1967, when he left the faith and returned to Judaism. His towering renditions of Bach's St Matthew Passion, Handel's Messiah, Beethoven's Missa solenne, Brahms's German Requiem and a superb disc of choruses from the B minor Mass (including an inaudible rendition of the Sanctus) all predate his conversion, whereas an elevated account of the complete B minor Mass (music that Klemperer considered the greatest ever written) dates from the year of his re-conversion. Put briefly, Klemperer's way with those mighty spiritual narratives, a cross between austerity and spiritual empathy, summons the aura of Old Testament prophets, specific damnation being, in context, a largely irrelevant issue. If you seek evidence of just how good they are, try 'Denn alles Fleisch, es ist wie Gras' from the German Requiem, with its loudly ringing horns – magnificent. The refurbishments, by the way, are superb.

A softer option for the Bach works can be found in Erato's Bach: The Great Sacred Works, featuring some distinguished soloists (Felicity Palmer, Kurt Equiluz, Werner Krenn, Anthony Rolfe Johnson, Barbara Schlick and others), Ensemble Vocal et Instrumental de Lausanne and the Lausanne Chamber Orchestra under Michael Corboz, a 10-disc extraction from 'The Complete Erato Recordings: Baroque and Renaissance Eras' (74 CDs on Erato, 12/22). By way of example, the St Matthew Passion's opening chorus (not up to 6'53" compared with Klemperer's 11'48", but the tone is still affectingly reverential. These are considered performances, nearly always transparent, with varied tempos (sometimes sprightly, sometimes not) and devotional in spirit. We've offered the two great Passions, the B minor Mass, Christmas Oratorio, Magnificat (in D) and Cantata No 187.

Like Klemperer, the American conductor Lorin Maazel looked no compromise when it came to his career. In 1980, expecting to become successor to Herbert von Karajan as chief conductor of the Berlin Philharmonic, he suddenly and publicly severed all connections with the orchestra when it was announced that Claudio Abbado was to take over. Luckily for us, Maazel had already made a number of remarkable recordings with the BPO for DG, including Rachmaninov's three symphonies, Symphony Dances and other orchestral works (1981-84), readings distinguished by seamless lines and some glorious playing. All are gathered together as part of a handsome 39-disc set of Maazel's complete recordings for DG.

Bartók's Concerto for Orchestra and Pavane (1979) are similarly sumptuous and charged with atmosphere, as is Zemlin's Lyrical Symphony (with Jula Varsady and Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau), but for me the high points in Maazel's BPO legacy are the early recordings, starting with the 1957 mono tapes of Romeo and Juliet music by Berlioz, Tchaikovsky and Prokofiev, the Berlioz (taken from his symphonic dramatizations) electrifying in the extreme. And what playing! My only quibble is, why omit so strongly with Romeo at the Temple of the Capulets? Surely Maazel of all people (who went on to prepare a King without Honor sequence with the BPO for Telarc) could have adapted the majestic closing 'Oath of Reconciliation' for orchestra without issues. Still, what we do have is dazzling. Schubert symphonies, too (stretching from No 2

Otto Klemperer projects a singular vision in his recordings of operatic and sacred works to the Unfinished, the Fourth a particular highlight, its opening Adagio molto like a Gainsborough scene masterfully reflected in sound. There are live New Year's Day Concerts with the Vienna Philharmonic, all of them stylishly turned. Maazel was a master of the Viennese 'lit' and, also with the VPO, Dvořák's Symphonies Nos 7-9 (good rather than exceptional). Maazel's French legacy includes Mozart's first and last symphonies and unforgettably poignant (and at times humorous) accounts of Ravel's mini-operas L'enfant et les sortilèges and L'heure espagnole with the French National Radio Orchestra (recorded in 1960 and 1965 respectively). A large-scale operatic masterpiece is Verdi's Luis Miller (Covent Garden with Plácido Domingo), an excellent performance from 1979, and there are also works by Beethoven, Brahms, Falla, Mendelssohn, Mozart, Mussorgsky, Respighi, Rimsky-Korsakov, Richard Strauss and Stravinsky.

Maazel was in general a less consistent recording artist than Herbert von Karajan and yet, having said that, I've always been in two minds about some of Karajan's commercial orchestral recordings. Too often they glare under a chameleon sheen (or seem too, so when you're lucky enough to catch one of the best taped Karajan broadcasts, which ditch the impression of excessive control-room production, the effect can be revelatory. Such is a recent Audite collection, 'Herbert von Karajan: The Early Lucerne Years, 1952-1957', which includes among its contents quite a few gems. Most unexpected is Brahms's Violin Concerto with Nathan Milstein, recorded in 1957, Karajan and his Swiss Festival Orchestra fully ablaze, Milstein an athlete of the bow, his tone typically lean and sinewy, the whole experience so different to the sumptuous Brahms that Christian Ferras, Karajan and the Berlin Phil provided for DG. Mozart's C minor Piano Concerto, K491, finds Karajan and his Swiss players supportive of Robert Casadesu in 1952, a subtle-tuned, finely sculpted reading where two strong personalities blend as one. Clara Haskil and Gita Anda combine superbly across Bach's C major Concerto for two pianos, BWV1061, in 1955, and there are two Beethoven symphonies, No 6 (Philharmonia Orchestra, 1956), which is similar in outline to Karajan's 1962 BPO recording except that the first-movement repeat is played, which is not in Berlin, and No 8 (Swiss Festival Orchestra, 1952), a lusty enactment, though the finale is no match for its dynamic 1962 Berlin successor. Honnegger's Symphonie imaginaire from 1955 swirls into action on the eye of a storm, though I wouldn't want to deny myself the extra breadth of the 'De profundis clamavi' second movement on Karajan's wonderful Berlin recording (14/26) as opposed to 13/07 in Lucerne). But turn to Brahms's Fourth with the Philharmonia (1956) and it's a whole different ball game, with added weight and muscle-power in Lucerne (note the timps in the Scherzo), especially in the finale at the point where the chorale theme returns at 5'41". It's an intriguing batch of musically worthwhile live Karajan discoveries, very well transferred from clean analogue sources. Here's hoping for more of the same.

Ward Marston's catalogue of freshly discovered or rediscovered musicians from the past is impressive by any standards, but with a three-disc set devoted to (mostly) live recitals featuring the Austrian-American pianist Robert Goldsand (1911-91), a Moritz Rosenthal pupil who launched his performing career at the age of 10, he scores even higher than usual. The recording dates are in the main between 1956 and 1978, with one or two recording commercially taped items thrown in for good measure (in Godowsky's Symphonic Metamorphosis on 'Die Fledermaus', taken from a 1964 Decca LP, and an abridged version of Rachmaninov's Variations on a Theme of Chopin as recorded by the Concert Hall Society in 1952). But it's the live items that make the biggest impression, Liszt's Grande Sonate de Beethoven a highlight, recorded in New York in 1956, 'Capriccio' all dynamism and filigree, 'La chaux' with its pristine turns of phrase and immediate trills, and a dapperly variegated 'Theme and Variations' warranting particular praise. Goldsand was a formidable virtuoso, yet his playing is often made up of the subtlest components, even in Rosenthal's spectacular reworking of Chopin's 'Minute' Waltz or Godowsky's ingenious 'Bedraggled' (the Studies Op 10 No 3 and Op 25 No 9 combined), both of which emerge more as music than as show-off stunts. By contrast, Clement's Sonata in F sharp minor, Op 25 No 5, is a model of finely sculpted classicism whereas Camargo Guarnieri's Sonata No 3 in the G Clef (published in 1948) kicks its heels in the manner of Villa-Lobos. As to the rest, we're offered Albinetti, Handel, more Chopin (principally in the originals), Prokofiev, Rachmaninov, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann and, to close, a warmly uplifting account of 'Jesus, son of man's' deicing' in Myra Hess's arrangement. It's an enticing introduction to a musician's music, and the transfers (by Seth Winson) are, for the most part, first-rate. So are Donald Marill's notes. ●

THE RECORDINGS

The Warner Classics Remastered Edition
Vol 2: Operas and Sacred Works Klemperer
Warner Classics (29 CDs) 5499 75289-9
J.S. Bach: The Great Sacred Works Corboz
Warner Classics (9 CDs) 75607-6
The Complete Deutsche Grammophon Recordings Maazel
DG (39 CDs) 486 3243
The Early Lucerne Years, 1952-1957 Karajan
Audite (4 ALBUMS) 464
The Lost Recitals Goldsand
Marston (5 CDs) 53026-2
www.audite.co.uk