musica Dei donum (Johan van Veen - 2013.11.18)

The space of the church in Muri is well suited for this repertoire, and has been effectively used to give an impression of how this music could have been heard in the time it was written. [...] It is notable that technical means, such as extra microphones, to "balance artificially the singers, or violins, or middle voices were consciously rejected in order to remain true to the feeling of the space and to the many different resulting 'desired effects', in particular of the text."
